5 Powerful Trout Fishing Techniques

By Areeb Khatib

Most anglers consider trout as one of their favorite "fishing friends" while fishing. This artful species is found everywhere. Different varieties of trout choose different types of places as their native habitat.

The territory from Labrador westward to the Saskatchewan is known as the native habitat of brook trout. Rainbow trout are conspicuous in the Pacific slope from Alaska to California.

Brown trout are abundantly seen in the waters of every American state except Texas, Oklahoma, North Dakota, Missouri, Mississippi, Louisiana, Kentucky, Kansas, Arkansas and Florida. Sometimes it has been spotted in the waters of some of these states, but there is no official verification of these citations, according to conservation officials. Brown trout also abound in some parts of Canada.

You need to consider some factors in order to successfully catch trout fish.

1. Do not grease the leader for it won't sink deep enough to give trouble, when pulling the lure and line from the water. However, if you allow it to float, the shadow cast by it, on the bottom of the stream, may scare away the trout.
2. Trouts can usually be secured through the use of dry fly. You should fish in both the current as well as in the pools for trout. Sometimes, it will be difficult for the angler to keep the fly from dragging or sinking because of the force of the current. The angler will have to depend on his dexterity for this.
3. It is not wise to fish for trout directly upstream as the leader, line, and flies will float directly over the fish. You should make the cast from one side of the stream. This will ensure that only the fly will float over the fish.
4. Remember that the first cast should be the best cast. Usually the first lure presented, is struck by a feeding trout if it floats over his private territory. You should never forget to fish in the lower end of the pool first, even if the trout are coming up in the upper or middle end.

5. On account of being moody or selective, trout may try the patience of any angler. Therefore, a fly or if necessary, a spent-wing fly or a fan wing, may do the trick without much hassle.

Indeed, you can enjoy a lot and have fun while fishing for trout. Following the tips above will definitely ensure a happy catch.

General overview about Trout Senses

By Brett Fogle

When fly fishing for trout, it is of crucial importance to understand their senses. Trout are fish, after all, and make different use of their senses than we do. Understanding these senses can greatly increase the prospects of a successful fly fishing trip. Many anglers make the common mistake of thinking trout are not very smart. As far as hatchery born fish are concerned, this is mostly correct.

However, in Montana and many other prime rivers in the world, most of the rivers are not stocked with hatchery born fish. Instead, the trout found will generally be wild trout. And wild trout, whether they be rainbows, browns or brookies, are always smarter than their hatchery born counterparts.

Additionally, even if you are fly fishing primarily for hatchery born fish, it is still good to know how a trout uses their senses. Why? Quite simply, by knowing how a trout uses their senses, your approach and presentation will be better, leading to less spooked fish and thus better results in the stream. While hatchery born fish are rather stupid, they aren't so stupid as to sit right on top of an anglers foot, patiently waiting for that fake fly to float right by.

It's also worth remembering that compared to other fish, trout tend to be smarter than most, especially the cunning Brown Trout. Because of this, when fly fishing for trout, don't go about it like you would go about bluegill fishing. If an angler goes about fishing for trout on the basis that they are stupid, the angler is likely to be disappointed. A trout that can survive the rigors of a trout stream, especially a Brown Trout, is a very cunning animal indeed.
