A Dealer May Be Best For Serious Problems

By Kadence Buchanan

It is well known that service departments at auto dealers almost always charge more than small garages for most repairs. That's because in order to run a service department at a dealership, the dealer must pay a fee to the auto maker. Naturally, they pass that cost along to consumers. For basic maintenance and small repairs, going to a local garage will probably save you money. However, for more complex repairs, a dealer's service department may be your best option. Here's why.

The mechanics who work in dealership service departments are highly trained in working with specific makes of cars and some may even specialize by specific model. They are typically extensively trained by the manufacturer and frequently attend refresher training courses. If your car is experiencing a problem that's common to your make of car but not common in others, a service department mechanic trained in working with your specific make and model will have an easier time catching it than a local garage, whose limited training resources must be spent on keeping up to date with many different makes and models.

Also, almost without exception, service departments offer some form of warranty on their work. Obviously, if the car is still covered by the master warranty any repeat repairs will be covered. But most auto dealer service departments warrant their work on cars that are out of warranty. The warranties are usually specific to the repair and may cover parts, labor and rental car expenses. Small garages may also offer warranties, but the advantage of a service department warranty is that it is usually good at any dealer of that make of car.

If the problem you're experiencing is the subject of a manufacturer's recall, a service department mechanic will be more likely to know about it. Service departments at car dealers typically run a check each time you bring your vehicle in for service to determine whether a recall has been issued for that make and model. Also, many car manufacturers require that recall repairs be done by a service department.

Finally, if your car needs to be in the shop for an extended period of time a service department that's located on the same site as an auto dealer can offer you more convenient access to a rental car. Many service departments have their own fleet of rentals. Or, if your car only needs to be in the shop for a day or less, many service departments have a courtesy shuttle.

Selling Your Coins Through Coin Dealers

By Bob Backstrom

Coin collecting is a very good hobby. Most of the coin collectors love to travel and are always on the lookout for collecting rare coins. Nobody can tell the exact value of a rare coin. There are thousands of coin dealers who buy coins and if you want to sell them, you can directly contact them.

A coin dealer could be a single person running the show or it could be a big company. Before selling a coin try to first research on the Internet about the coin value, coin condition, etc, and then contact at least 2–3 coin dealers and discuss the rates.

The first thing you should do while selling your coins, is create a list of the coins and get quotes from different coin dealers. One more source where you can sell your coins is through the Internet. Websites like ebay would come in handy if you would like to sell your coins. You can list the coins in an online auction or set a fixed price and sell. There are many coin sellers and dealers who buy old/rare coins online, so listing your coins online for sale is not a bad idea at all.

If you are thinking of selling your coins through a dealer then make sure the dealer is a reputable and honest person. Find out for how many years the dealer has been in the coin collection business. Always remember, that it does not mean the dealer is an honest and sincere person if he advertises in a leading newspaper. So make sure you ask for testimonials from the dealer.

You can contact the dealer in many ways, through email, phone etc. Make a list of the coin rates the dealer is willing to pay you. The more dealers you contact the better rates you will get. Some dealers collect only a certain type of coin and won't buy other types of coins. So, you can sell some coins to such a dealer and some to other dealers.

Make sure you bargain and get a good quote and once the negotiation is completed sell and get your money immediately.
