Baseball tickets to AL East games are always interesting, but the gauntlet has been thrown down, and the first team to make a big statement in a tight race has done so this season. The New York Yankees have staked a big-time claim on the division, and it's going to be tough to catch them barring a monumental collapse.

New York Yankees:

Currently: The Yankees have just completed the 2006 version of the "Boston Massacre," having swept the Red Sox in a five game series for the first time in Boston since 1943. This huge sweep caps off a good month for the Yankees, as they went 20-9 over the past 30 days and have taken a strong hold on the division. The offensive formula seems to be Derek Jeter and Johnny Damon getting on base and have Jason Giambi bringing them home. So far, it's working quite well.

Outlook: Unless the Yankees stumble seriously, this is now their division to lose.

Boston Red Sox

Currently: The other side of this equation is the Red Sox, who appear to be settling in for another season of disappointment. They now find themselves 6.5 games back as of this writing, and their record over the past 30 days could be an indication of why they were just swept by their hated rivals - 10-19. Aside from David Ortiz and Manny Ramirez, this appears to be a flawed team, and the Yankees just exposed them.

Outlook: It's close to panic button time for the Red Sox, as they need to get on a tear immediately.

Toronto Blue Jays

Currently: The Blue Jays are quietly having a decent season, but it has to be disappointing to be basically out of the race this early. Their previous 30 days all but slammed the door shut, as they went only 12-16, including a brutal seven-game losing streak. The Blue Jays have some very good players in place, including Troy Glaus and Roy Halladay, so there's hope for the Blue Jays and baseball tickets sales in the future.

Outlook: The Blue Jays will be a tough spoiler to deal with the rest of the season, but they're still a year away.

Baltimore Orioles

Currently: The Orioles are what they are – a mediocre team that appears to be a long way from challenging for anything of significance. They turned in another not-so-good month, posting a record of 11–15 which included losing seven of eight games to the three teams ahead of them in the division standings. On a positive note, Miguel Tejada is having a great season, and if the Orioles are ever going to rebound, this is a guy that can be a centerpiece.

Outlook: The team needs players and direction. It has little of either right now, and that's why they are what they are.

Tampa Bay Devil Rays

Currently: This just in – the Devil Rays are terrible. They're doomed to finish another year in their traditional spot – at the bottom of the division standings. Another month, another bad record – the Devil Rays put up a putrid 9–18 record over the past 30 days, and that's not going to get it done in any division.

Outlook: The Devil Rays do have a couple of pieces in place with Scott Kazmir and Carl Crawford, but they need many more before they're ready to compete and start selling baseball tickets with any regularity.

The NL Central may look to be decided, but baseball tickets in at least a few cities are going to be worth the effort to obtain as the season steams towards the finish line. The Cardinals are still on top of the standings, but the Reds are still within striking distance and can also clinch the Wild Card despite a miserable recent stretch of games.

St. Louis Cardinals

Currently: The Cardinals have held onto their lead, even though they didn't have a great month. The team went 15–13 over the past 30 days, but that was good enough to lengthen their lead given the struggles of the Reds. This team is all about Albert Pujols, who's having an historic season.

Outlook: Keep Pujols healthy and Chris Carpenter moving along, and they'll cruise to the division title.

Cincinnati Reds

Currently: The Reds started the month well enough, but have crashed recently, losing nine of their last ten games. That's not how you make a run for the pennant, but the good news is that they're still in contention for the postseason if they can right the ship.

Outlook: Keep Adam Dunn rolling and get the pitching figured out, as it's been torched lately.

Houston Astros

Currently: Not that it'll matter in the big picture, but the Astros got to a 15–14 record over the past 30 days with streaky baseball. The Astros suffered through a five–game losing streak and then beat up on the Pirates and Brewers to forge a six–game winning streak.

Outlook: This season is effectively over, but fans should get their baseball tickets to take one more look at Roger Clemens.

Milwaukee Brewers

Currently: The Brewers were hanging tough for most of the season, but a recent 10–game losing streak ended any hope that they had in regards to a Wild Card push. That losing streak contributed to a record of 11–18 over the past 30 days, effectively ending the competitive aspect of their 2006 season.

Outlook: This is a young and talented team, and they could be much–improved in 2007.

Chicago Cubs

Currently: The Cubs endured another typically lousy month, going 10–18 over the past 30 days. This season has been a major disappointment.

Outlook: The Cubs need to rebuild their infrastructure with young players who are not injury–prone. Until that happens, this is where you'll continue to see them in the standings.

Pittsburgh Pirates

Currently: The Pirates' past 30 days wasn't too bad, as they went 13–15 over the past 30 days. Their season is over, but it appears that they're developing some players for the future.

Outlook: Jason Bay and Freddy Sanchez will be worth the price of baseball tickets for the rest of this season and next, particularly if the Pirates can surround them with some talent.
