Beer Brewing Big And Creative In America

By Andrea Nichol

Breweries in America are growing at an exponential rate. Beer brewing is becoming big business with a resurgence of traditional types of ales and lagers combining with more exotic offerings. With a colourful history, beer carries on its controversial way to regain the traditional role it's always played as an every-day beverage, while taking on a more creative flavour to please every palate.

Back in 1620, when the Mayflower came to America's shores, the boat fell a bit short of its destination due to a shortage of beer, according to a passenger's journal. One doesn't think Puritans would have drunk beer - they were Puritans, after all - however this was the every-day drink of choice. People drank beer as we drink pop, juice, milk and water today. Each tavern and inn brewed its own beer.

It is only in modern society that we see beer as having a perilous quality. There were no laws governing beer brewing and drinking. There were no police roadblocks to catch drunk drivers. How much damage could a horse and cart inflict? Certainly there were no scantily-clad women prancing about at parties, drinking beer and impressing men with their sudsy sexiness. Beer was an every-day beverage drunk by everyone in the household from adult to child. When the Mayflower arrived, the people discovered that the Natives made their beer from maize. Wonder which beer was drunk at the first Thanksgiving? This may have been the first ever "Bring Your Own Beer (BYOB)."

The United States has become an international contender in beer brewing and the country can hold its own when in competition with other countries that are notorious for making amazing beer. The U.S. prohibition slowed things down a little, but in the 21st century, things seem to be heating up for American breweries. According to the Brewer's Association, nearly 7 million barrels of beer will be made and drunk by Americans in 2006. That's a lot of kegs, bottles, pints and glasses!

Online there are multitudes of sites about beer: beer brewing magazines to read like "Yankee Brew News" and "Brewery News;" breweries to visit; associations for beer-makers to join like the Brewer's Association; festivals to attend like the Barleywine Festival in Buffalo, New York; and competitions to enter like the World Beer Cup held in Seattle, Washington. Of these sites, about 85% are based in the U.S. so the Americans seem to be leading the pack!

Beer Brewing Big And Creative In America

During the 1960s, 70s and 80s, beer in America was primarily made and distributed by large beer brewing companies. In the early 1980s, many of the states passed legislation that allowed the smaller microbreweries to get in on the action. The large companies still do big business, but many patrons are fussy and want high-quality, exclusive beers; they are the "yuppies" of beer drinkers. In and around any city in America, there are anywhere from 2 to 20 breweries within a 15-mile radius of that city and the numbers are growing. Some states have more breweries than others. Each microbrewery has a family tradition they want to maintain and each beer is different; a return to the old days when two taverns a mile apart had two different-tasting beers.

The breweries have gone back to creating beers that are made from all-natural ingredients like malt, hops and yeast. They produce traditional lagers and ales together with exotic beers that have a hint of spices, vanilla, caramel, coriander and anise. One brewery, found online, uses rose hips in their beer. Usually used for tea, rose hips must provide an interesting taste to beer. Lemon coriander beer may be quite refreshing on a hot day.

Soon we will be having discussions about what type of beer goes best with chicken or beef. We'll hear opinions like: "The caramel-flavoured beer would go great with that cheesecake; a sweet beer just made for dessert." Is that beer good for pasta? Would it be better with a roast beef dinner? Already there are countless beer-tasting functions. Is beer the new wine? Is there a "twirl-glass-sniff-liquid-swish-in-mouth" process for beer? Like martinis, there are excessive amounts of beer types. Perhaps the process should be expedited; Beertinis for everyone!

The beer brewing companies in America, found online, emphasize the importance of quality. They discuss the importance of tradition. They discuss the importance of bringing beer back to its every-day role played for thousands of years. This time, breweries also seem to feel beer can be creative-tasting and still be in demand.

For people who brew beer at home, a packaged beer making kit is the right choice. As long as your kit has the four ingredients needed to make beer, then you can have a finished product within seven to 10 days. You can also purchase beer-making kits online. Beer-Wine.com is one of the most popular online sites where you can get complete beer making kits needed for brewing beer at home. From beer making equipments to brewing grains and bottling supplies and so on, this online company gives you a wide array of choices where you can build your beer making kit from scratch.

Get you Personalized Kit:

Beer making kits come with an instructional book that guides you through the process of brewing beer at home. A normal beer making kit comes with: a 6.5-gallon primary fermenter with lock and lid, an adhesive thermometer, a bottle filler, a hydrometer, a bottle brush and more. In addition to this, you will need a large boiling pot and two cases of 12 oz. bottles.

Beer making kits come in wide varieties. Depending on your interest and the kind of money you want to spend, you can go for a deluxe beer making kit, ultimate beer making kits, ingredient kits and more. For more information on selecting ingredient kits, you can check out the online catalogue of Beer-Wine.com. Of all the beer making kits available in the market, the premium gold beer making kits are the best in the market. They have all the necessary ingredients to make beer of remarkable quality. The unique blend of brewing hops and special cultured yeast is used to make crystal clear beer. The premium gold kits produce six gallons of beer and 23 gallons of highly distinctive ales.

The whole process of brewing beer and ales is not new. In fact, the Germans introduced a law prohibiting the use of any ingredients other than the four raw materials. However, as markets for beer expanded, this law was abolished by the European Economic Community (EEC) to promote free trade and also to preserve beer. With more competition, cheaper varieties were used in the brewing process. To live up to the authentic and traditional spirit of making beer, the premium gold range kit was introduced for making the finest quality beer. Connoisseurs Range was also introduced to make strong beers that feature different beer styles from around the globe.

So if you want the real, memorable taste of beer, then go for authentic beer making kits that will give you the finest and best quality beer at home—a standard which even international markets cannot reach.
