Choosing The Best Flower Shop

By Hannah Roberts

When choosing a flower shop, you first want to look at the quality of the flowers on sale. Make sure they are fresh. When a shop has a garden nearby, this is a good sign, because its flowers will be freshly picked.

Some flower shops even sell roses and other kinds of flowers that are still planted. The best florists will then pick and cut whatever flowers you choose.

If are planning for a flower delivery, make sure the shop delivers fresh flowers on time! Ask about how long the time period is between when the flowers are picked and when they are finally delivered. Even ask about the type of vehicle the florists use.

If you don't know what kind of flowers to buy, browse the colorful shop. There should be tulips, roses, daffodils and everything else you can imagine. And then of course, certain occasions call for certain flowers.

To really find the best flower shop in town, ask friends who have frequently bought flowers in the past (maybe they are in a leadership position and often decorate for special events). You can even scout out a flower plantation to make sure the plants are bred and fertilized well.

Not only are the actual types of flowers important, but so are the arrangements. You will need to find a flower shop that employs clever designers who create elegant, presentable bouquets for any occasion.

You can even research different flower shops online! Many shops can be partially, or wholly, based on the web and they don't operate much differently than normal markets except that the payment and transaction process is of course markedly different (and more convenient). However, it is best to check up on a shop personally, rather than with the Internet, as your eyes and nose can truly detect the freshness and health of a shop's flowers.

Another good thing to ask a flower shop employee is if the store offers refunds for damaged flowers. This way, if you receive flowers upon delivery that simply aren't fresh, you can refuse to pay for them.

Where To Find The Cheapest Flower Shops

By Hannah Roberts

If you're in the market for flowers, especially if you plan on purchasing a whole bunch, it will be important to find the cheapest flower shops in your area. So once you find a shop that features low prices, make sure the quality of flowers aren't low either.

When browsing flower shops, you'll want to find out which ones offer the finest and freshest flowers. Shops that are next-door to a garden are usually a good bet - as they grow their flowers on site! Not only are their flowers fresher, but they are also cheaper because there is no middleman for these shops.

Similarly, flower shops that sell roses or other types of flowers that are still planted can also boast low prices. Some shops order flowers from a big plantation and unless they buy an extremely large amount of them, there is overhead, and thus the price to the customer is higher. Not to mention, these flowers have a chance to age and wither during the road trip over to the store. Shop attendants who pick the flower and cut it right in front of your eyes, are really preferable, as you can be sure of the quality.

Delivery services often are free of charge and even so, the surprise your loved one will feel when they receive a flower arrangement at their door is priceless. Just make sure delivery is on time and there is a refund policy for flowers that arrive in poor condition. If you ask about what vehicle the shop employs and what the window of time is between the flower picking and the final delivery, this can help you better pick a delivery service.

The Internet provides you with a vast amount of resources as well. Search for a shop or specific type of flower that you are interested in; you'll find that browsing for flowers online is a surprisingly easy task. But because there is no florist on hand to answer your questions or assure you of the quality of the store's products, make sure to investigate things, like the refund policy, on your own.

And of course, it's always nice to support your local florist - if you develop a relationship with the workers at your nearby shop, you may be able to snag some nifty discounts.
