Cowgirl Party Games

By Rehan Husain

Fun in cowgirl party mostly happened in doing things which is rough and tough. Try out some game for your kids to have more excitement and be more like a cowgirl.

For the third game the girls clasped hands and formed a circle. Susie's hat was placed in the center on its crown. Then the girls, keeping their hands clasped, tried to pull and push each other so as to make someone knock the hat over. Each girl who bumped the hat over dropped out of the circle. The hat was righted and the game went on, until a single winner remained.

By this time the girls were ready for a quiet game. The winner of the last game started the new one. She said, "My horse is active." The next girl in the circle to her right used the same sentence adding an adjective beginning with "b." For instance, "My horse is active and bony." The third said, "My horse is active, bony, and clever." And so on around the circle. Anyone not able to think of an adjective beginning with the next letter of the alphabet dropped out of the circle.

Then followed a "Driving Race." Two groups of three girls each were selected. In each group two of the girls were chosen as horses. These two girls made a seat of their hands, each girl taking hold of her right wrist with her left hand and taking hold of the left wrist of the other girl with her right hand. The horses were blindfolded. The third girl was then seated on this human chair, and all three were turned around two or three times until the blindfolded horses lost all sense of direction. The signal to start was given and the two teams raced across the room and back; the blindfolded horses being guided by the girl riders who directed them. Of course, the team getting across the room and back first was the winners.

By this time the cowgirls were ready for a feed. The long dining table with its red-and-white-checked cloth was set with shiny tin cups, plates and knives; no forks or spoons. For once these little girls could forget their ladylike manners. Eating creamed potatoes and a slice of meat loaf with a knife was not too bad, but by the time they reached the buttered peas and Jello salad they were laughing so heartily they could scarcely eat. A slice of apple pie to be eaten with the same knife, and a tin cup of milk completed the hilarious meal.

Cowgirl Party Games

At the conclusion of the party the young cowgirls gave three "yippee" for the young hostess and her clever cowgirl party.

It is a great enjoyment for a cowgirl to experience new game like driving race, knock the hat and especially eating the buttered peas and Jello salad with a knife. It gives a delightful and fun feeling to the young girls.

Cowgirl Party

By Rehan Husain

Every child is unique. They all have different attitude and ways of having fun. Cowgirl party is one of the most different but interesting party for girls. Let's find out on how Susie with her group held her birthday party.

The next game was "Grandma." Linda was the first Grandma and stood with her face to the wall. The other players stood in a line across the room. The idea of the game is for the players to creep up on Grandma without being seen. Grandma could turn at any time to look over her left shoulder or her right shoulder, but she could not at any time turn all the way around. If Grandma caught sight of a player moving she sent her back to the starting point. The player who first was able to creep up on Grandma and touch her took Linda's place and became the next Grandma.

Teatime came all too quickly. It consisted of thin nut-bread sandwiches cut with fancy cookie cutters, and cocoa. Old-fashioned snowballs and plenty of ice cream satisfied the sweet tooth. Snowballs, so popular in Grandmother's day, are squares of white cake frosted on all sides with white cocoanut frosting. Linda and her guests all decided that having a "Grandmother's" party was lots of fun.

Susie's round up Susie and her crowd had outgrown the tea-party stage. They had no time for dolls and were not yet interested in boys. Like many others of her age Susie was "cowgirl crazy." All she wanted for her birthday was a "Complete cowgirl outfit, and a party."

Cowgirl Party Games

This posed a stumper but her clever mother found a solution. Susie's house became a ranch house and Susie invited all her crowd to a roundup. Costumes which called for jeans, boots and a sombrero brought pleasure to these young fillies who were at the moment very opposed to "dressing up." As soon as the girls arrived at Susie's, they sensed the atmosphere of ranch life. A fire roared in the fireplace. Beside it lay a huge birch log with an ax driven into it. On the other side of the fire boots were drying. On the newel post of the stairway stood a tin bucket of water with its accompanying dipper. Paper cups were hidden back of the bucket so no one actually drank out of the dipper.

For an opener Susie passed her cowgirl hat in which she had put a number of slips each bearing the name of a horse, such as Trigger, Silver, Knight, and others. Each guest drew one, pinned it to her dress, and became owner of that particular horse. The first game was "Ring Pan" toss. Susie put an angel food cake tin on a bare table, the dining table can be used, and shoved it against the wall. With small pieces of adhesive tape she marked the outer ring of the pan five points and the inner ring twenty-five points. The girls used five ping-pong balls for the game. Standing at the opposite end of the table from the cake tin, the girls took turns bouncing the balls into the pan, of course always trying to bounce into the center ring. Susie acted as score-keeper and announced the winners.

Next the cowgirls tried their skill with a rope. A small clothesline was used as a lasso. Susie's cowgirl hat was hung on the back of a dining-room chair and the girls, standing ten feet away, tried to lasso the hat off the chair back. Each girl had three tries and was awarded another try for a successful throw.

This party is quite fun for a girl who have a unique desire of fun. But it requires a little big space, so proper arrangement of place should be done before the party girl arrived.
