Dive South Africa is proud to be part of Operation Zembe by Dive South Africa

In 1995 leading South African marine archaeologist Bruno Werz found a hand axe whilst surveying a shipwreck in False Bay off Cape Town. This was identified as an Acheulean tool dating back 300 000 to a million years, the oldest under sea find ever recorded, an archaeological oddity that raised a series of fascinating questions.

Further brief explorations of this site over the next few years revealed another hand axe and some pieces of animal bone. Realizing that this site has international significance, through SAIMA (South African Institute of Maritime Archaeology) Bruno has requested the assistance of the Dorset based Scientific Exploration Society (www.ses-explore.org) to be the first group to truly investigate this and other sites. The SES immediately accepted the challenge of launching an expedition.

From 3 to 28 November 2004 a SES-team under leadership of the world famous Monty Halls will be exploring and excavating potential sites from Table Bay to Cape Agulhas.

The divers will have to visualize the seabed, as it would have appeared millions of years ago, with teeming reefs as dry canyons. The idea is to scan areas of seabed, and identify where prehistoric man would have made camp. Once such areas are identified, they will be surveyed.

The main site is in 6 meter (20ft) of water just behind the surf zone. The conditions are demanding, with the added fear factor that this is Great White territory where this feared predator are out in the hunt for food.

The name Zembe is a direct translation of "axe" from the Nguni language.

Dive South Africa is proud to be a family owned business specialising in scuba diving safaris and holidays to Southern Africa and Mozambique. We have lived and dived in South Africa and Mozambique for all of our lives and know the dive sites, charters, lodges, sharks, wrecks and reefs like the back of our hands – always safe, and always conserving the reefs and animals.<http://www.divesouthafrica.co.za>

ICANN Registrar: za–domains for anybody

ICANN Registrar: za–domains for anybody by Hans Peter Oswald

Cologne, 12.10. 2004. ICANN accredited registrar Secura announces today, that the company is accepting the registration of za–domains.

The co.za–domains are the domains of South Africa. The co.za–domains belong to the popular domains in Africa.

You cannot register at .za. If your name is not available at co.za, you can also register at org.za.

The com–domain is best for websites that target international markets, while .co.za–domains are best for South African webpages or those with a strong South African reference. This is so because surfer are used to, and you may lose a part of your target group if you deviate from the expected Top Level Domain.

Even if you should own a com–domain, it is advisable to register also a .co.za–domain as well. The za–domains are available on a first–come–first–serve basis.

There are no specific requirements for registering za–domains. A local presence or registered company in South Africa is not a requirement for a co.za name.

ICANN accredited registrar Secura can register a za–domain at once, if the domain name is free.
