Encyclopedias Can Open Doors

By Rachel Lynn

For anyone who has read a great deal, The World Book Encyclopedia probably has several positive associations in the memory banks. I remember as a kid I started learning from encyclopedias by using the children's classic sets. From there, I started reading about all the issues related to my adolescent stage. Finally, by sneaking behind my parents' backs, I researched all the more adult issues. After reading all the fiction that I could find, I resorted to the Compton Encyclopedia and The World Book Encyclopedia as well as other research resources.

On the other hand, my brother stuck strictly to the encyclopedias. He read through them as if they were novels as he stretched out in Dad's recliner working his way from A through Z. Volume by volume, he completed the entire encyclopedia set without doing much talking at all. My mother said he would grunt if spoken to, but other than that he seemed to deem words as unnecessary.

Of course, being the genius that he was, my brother attended college and went into Military Intelligence. I can imagine that he probably read all the other encyclopedias that exist just to compare their information.

As my brother closed himself off to read the encyclopedias, I remember dreaming of becoming a writer when I grew up. I even considered writing entries for encyclopedias. This is a great family site

. Forgetting all about this childhood dream, I went on to college and became a professor. Later as I searched for ways to become a freelance writer, I found a request for submissions for a literary encyclopedia. After applying, I continued to write for web content while forgetting all about the application. Finally, the editor made contact to offer some selections of book reviews and literary surveys that would be added to an online database. Personally, I consider it to be the perfect job.

Since my brother is now an MIS, I envision his reading online encyclopedias. Although he still doesn't talk or write much, he can access information online and email when he does have a few words of love and encouragement. As we are all busy in this world of technology, it is nice knowing we can even get the number one encyclopedia, The World Book Encyclopedia, online.

Shower Doors - Choosing The Right One For You

By Joshua Wills

Shower doors come in several different designs, not to mention finishes. Choosing the right one may seem like a choice best made by random selection. However, this article will give you a few pointers to help you choose the right shower door.

Choice #1: Framed or frameless?

Shower doors come with or without metal frames. Those without metal frames are made of thick glass, and do not need a frame for support. Framed shower doors, on the other hand, are made from thinner glass that requires the extra support of a metal frame.

Frameless shower doors have several distinct advantages over framed shower doors. First of all, the lack of a metal frame means there are fewer places to catch water and / or to grow mold, mildew, etc. Secondly, frameless doors have a sleek, refined visual appeal that framed doors don't have.

Choice #2: Bi-fold, pivot, or sliding?

Shower doors are also available with different methods of opening and shutting them.

Sliding doors are probably the most common design. They are design for half of the door to slide behind the other half to open. The disadvantage to this design is that it doesn't work well with shower stalls, due to the width it requires.

Pivoting shower doors open just like a standard door does. The disadvantage to this style is obvious - it requires enough space in the room to swing open.

Bi Fold shower doors are somewhat of a compromise between the first two designs. They don't require width, nor do they require a lot of space in the room to open up into.

Choice #3: Finish

If you choose a framed shower door, you'll have to choose a finish for the metal, too. Most of the time, you'll want to choose a finish that matches the finish of your other bathroom fixtures.
