Many newspapers accurately pinpoint the powerful public mood on immigration and asylum, yet all are seemingly puzzled as to why New Labour seem hell bent on allowing so many in with so few checks in place, if any at all.

It seems palpably clear to me that this is simply so they will all VOTE New Labour, and the Superstate will come further into being on the back of it, as no one will ever be able again in the future to vote it out, if indeed voting is to be allowed in the future envisaged by our supremos.

Several years, and many eons ago, New Labour flourished in a political vacuum. We were all tired of politics, sleaze, stagnation and a somewhat one horse race. However, the British like an underdog.

Lo, step forward New Labour, a new star in the firmament, who tried to make it seem being funded by the Unions is not actually a problem to governing the country, a bit like being free to do your own thing when it is your parents who are footing the bill.

The current rise in militancy and ever more incessant strikes would seem to bear this out, and what use pouring billions into national institutions if you cannot curb wage demands to reasonable levels, without fear of losing crucial funding.

Despite feverish attempts to refund via other means in the early days, the bulk of New Labour monetary backing is still hugely Union based, even though its party membership is savagely dwindling.

England Expects Every Man Will Do His Duty

The days of Labour representing the working man are now lost in the mists of time, they essentially represent themselves now.

To get elected at the outset, every tiniest minority group imaginable was courted and mobilised to vote, and are still being paid their thirty pieces of silver in favourable legislation for quirky groups now.

And so a dream was unfolded by the dream weaver, and we wanted to believe in a new way. Unfortunately this was based on huge government and public borrowing and massive taxation, and is now beginning to unravel before our eyes. We see it but we do not see it, as we know what is coming but pretend it is not there.

It is too awful to contemplate for now.

This is where we are now, except some sly and underhanded changes were going on behind the great illusionists panoply of tricks and grins on the surface. Gloss up front slime beneath.

Imagine the Last Night of the Proms, a quintessentially British occasion. It is synonymous with the Royal Albert Hall.

Imagine then it being moved to Earls Court, as the structure is deemed unsafe. Then leaflets are handed out at every entrance purveying alternative contemporary entertainment elsewhere the self same evening, and finally when inside the conductor changes the score to something less fervent and Nationalistic, and bans the waving of the Union Jack during the performance.

Unimaginable.

This may seem fictional, however what is happening here is not.

For the Royal Albert Hall read Britain, for structural failure read the erosion of centuries of foundations of constitutional tradition and Judicial and political checks, balances and counterbalances, to say nothing about our own Monarchy. Chipping away, brick by brick, stone by stone, pebble by pebble, drip on drip down the drain to decay and oblivion.

For leaflets purveying alternative entertainment, read subversion of the teaching of the history of this realm in schools, and attempts to coerce the independant nature of the BBC.

Tinkering with the teaching of History and trying to traduce the media and foremostly the hitherto bastion of BBC independence should ring some alarm bells.

What do they have to do before we see it all as it is,
BURN ALL THE BOOKS.

Then we normally have an orchestra and a Great Conductor, one leading, and the other interpreting and singing the same tune to the Nation except now there is only a conductor, who plays without orchestra directly to the media and ignores the assembled audience, who are summarily denied the waving of the Union Jack or any semblance of National pride throughout his virtuoso performance.

We are well on our way to a Superstate, and abjugating our rights and heritage to Brussels, via the constant dilution of the lifeblood of the Monarchy, the House of Lords, the Judiciary, the Lord Chancellor, and our very constitution in the name of anachronistic edifices not suited nor in tune to modern government.

It has suited well enough for nigh on 1000 years, and next time He says the EU is merely a cleaning up exercise, remember how He is trying to clean up the 600 year old post of Lord Chancellor without consultation or consideration or referendum, just tossing centuries of history aside without a mandate.

Shades of Megalomania there as well as his Messianic rhetoric on war, and his imagined neo Churchillian posture.

How the great man must chuckle at such a parody,
how his memory is slurred by association,
Orwellian possibly, Churchillian never.

The whole point of our Monarchy, House of Lords, Judiciary, and pomp and ceremony, however outdated and anachronistic some parts of it may well be , is not what they do, or represent, as much as what they PREVENT from coming into being by their mere presence.

Viz a viz, President Blair, or Chairman Blair.

Currently we have New Labour actively and systematically dismantling all the above institutions piece by piece, whilst we do nothing and in doing nothing condone the vandalism of our own culture, in what was our own land.

England Expects Every Man Will Do His Duty

In the countdown to election this is becoming a mad stampede to destroy before the fact, an accelerated agenda of attrition on our core of Britishness.

If this continues there will be no Rule Britannia or last night of the proms, no Churchill, no Telford, no Nelson, just greyness, beurocrats and Chairman Blair.

Almost everyone I know wanted to march on London for one good reason or another over the last year or so, futile as it is as we are all summarily ignored out of hand.

We are deemed fools to be manipulated, stupid enough to swallow gullibly anything we are fobbed off with.

I must admit I did not vote in the three or four elections before the last one, as I became apathetic with politics, and could not see much real difference between the parties or much difference between their purported policies. However now we have a party who would ruin this Countrys traditions, and make us all drones to the EU, presumably and coincidentally with President Blair EU at the helm.

If we could not all march on London, then surely we can march as far as the polling booths in the summer to speak on councils and Europe, paving the way clear for a referendum or vote of no confidence.

Then next Spring we might stagger there again to vote out those who feed us one lie after another and worse still assume us ultra gullible and laughably malleable.

They may find our density is of a different form than they expected or imagined, being one huge mass opposing their hypocrisy, lies and subterfuge.

Its not really British to bother too much with elections and politics, but if we ignore the next one there may well be no more British, and no more real politics. Just the state.

This may well be the last time we can remove them via the ballot box, as there are legions of mercenaries being imported solely to vote New Labour, whilst they propose lowering the voting age to 16 and even having teenage MPs, as they would apparently vote New Labour wholesale. Perhaps the grip on the media whilst lowering school standards to abysmal levels is not altogether without rhyme or reason, easier to lead by the nose.

Add to this the other hordes of disadvantaged and estranged minorities already aboard and soon we will simply all be outnumbered even if we all shake off our lethargy and vote, and who is in any event monitoring the registration of voters, given the ease with which it is possible to register in multiple counties for council elections virtually undetected. I would seriously tighten up voting rights and registration and seriously question whether brand new arrivals to the country should be allowed to vote as of right straight away with no qualification period.

Remember, all these freebie voting favours from minorities and the like all will require legislative payback in coin at a later date, with our money.

You owe it to your country one last time to vote to preserve our way of life, our traditions, our history, our heritage, and above all our right to be British not Blairish, the man who grudgingly allowed us to celebrate the Rugby World Cup on a Monday.

At present there are still institutions and traditions and laws to uphold your views, rights and electoral preferences, and reflect your currently ignored wishes and feelings in Parliament, instead of having them derided and steamrolled aside in the guise of modernity and social progress.

It is likely that if these are re elected next time this will cease to be an option.

Your Country Needs You.
Again.

England's World Cup Dream Over

By Steven Cronin

England Expects Every Man Will Do His Duty

Once again England's remarkable inability from spot kicks has cost them a place in the semi-finals of the World Cup.

The 3–1 shoot out defeat to Portugal was a repeat of the European Championship exit two years earlier when the Portuguese were on home soil.

England have now lost six of the seven penalty shootouts they have been involved in.

Contrast this to Germany, who since defeat to Czechoslovakia in the 1976 European Championships have won every shootout they have been involved in.

That record becomes even more incredible when you consider they have also scored every individual penalty within the shootout.

But England's demise could have been avoided had Sven–Goran Eriksson employed better use of the players at his disposal.

His decision to stick with David Beckham when the England captain is clearly past his best has caused frustration for many fans.

This was compounded by the performance of Aaron Lennon when he finally got his chance in place of Beckham during the second half of the quarterfinal.

His pace and dribbling caused panic in the Portuguese defence, something Beckham rarely achieved, and fans can only wonder how England would have fared had he been used earlier.

England's chances were further inhibited when their one genuine world class star Wayne Rooney was played out of his best position and employed as a lone front man.

Rooney is at his devastating best playing behind a main striker and running at defences from thirty yards out.

England's tactics of hitting him with long balls was a complete waste of his talents and a let off for the Portuguese defence.

But with Eriksson now departed, the reigns of the England manager's job are passed on to Steve McClaren, Eriksson's assistant for the past five years.

Fans can only hope McClaren introduces a new attacking brand of football to excite the supporters and break with more defensive instincts of Eriksson.

We await with baited breath.
