Downloading music from the internet is fast becoming one of the world's biggest growth industries. A student is now trying to tap into the market by setting up a website for independent musicians to sell their songs on an international stage.

Hawksbillmusic.com, the creation of Joseph Lavington, an 18-year-old student from England, is open to all independent musicians – local, national and international. Internet surfers are able to download and listen to songs up to three times for no charge. If they like the track, they have to buy it to hear it again and the artist receives half of every sale.

Joseph, from the city of Bath, England, said, "There has been a lot of talk of musicians being ripped off by downloads. So many albums and songs have been leaked on to the web and downloaded by fans. The musician's rights are ignored, and he or she loses a lot of money. It discourages record labels from investing in new talent."

Several high-profile bands have taken file-sharing networks to court and won, and now record labels are suing downloaders themselves. But Joseph said: "The artists get a fair deal with Hawksbill Music, and much more cash than other similar services".

Each song will cost between 50p and £2, and once a purchase has been made, the buyer will be free to transfer it to CD or portable player. Users who have purchased a track are encouraged to share it with others, and will earn a small cut of any sales that result from this.

A wide range of artists, of differing genres, have already signed up including Reed Rothchild, a Los Angeles ambient-electronic composer, and Tetric, a highly experimental Canadian four-piece. Joseph said, "I am confident Hawksbill will be a success, as a whole new avenue in the music world has been opened."

If you are looking for digital music downloads, you want to start with the big music services. They usually have the largest legal catalogs and sometimes even their own music player to help you store and manage your play list.

If you go to a store like iTunes for example, not only can you get your digital music downloads, but you can download the iTunes music player filled with lots of cool features to help you manage your music list. There are also lots of other file sharing applications that you can use to search for items that might be harder to find like out of date albums, movies from other time periods like the 70's, 50's or even the 40's etc.

The best thing about getting you download online is that it is much easier to manage all of your music. If you get an mp3 player for example, you can fit up to 10,000 songs on this one little piece of equipment. No more ugly racks in the living room filled with rows and rows of CD cases.

It also gives you the ability to mix and math your songs as you see fit. This is a good way to make sure that you enjoy a little bit of your music collection every day.

You don't want to get so overwhelmed with huge stacks of CDs lying around that you just listen to turn around and list to the CD that is closest to your computer station. Branch out and enjoy millions of digital music downloads online via mp3 or radio streams. That's a pretty good deal to me.
