The most important material in making your own perfume is the scented oils. These oils can be purchased from most craft stores and shoppets. The oils that will be used often come in three different categories. The categories are classified based on the strength of the scent. A top note will generally include lime, lavender, orange, spearmint, or peppermint. The middle note oils include geranium, coriander, and basil. The bottom note, also commonly referred to as the base note, includes sandalwood, cinnamon, cedar wood, and vanilla. Each oil selection may vary. In addition to the mentioned examples, other classified oils can easily be obtained for making perfume.

When mixing the oils, it is important to follow directions. The correct combinations should be mixed in the correct order and proportion; otherwise the perfume will not come out smelling as it should. The bottom note, or base note, oils should be added first. After adding the bottom note oils, next will come the middle note oils. And finally the top note oils will be added. An easy way to remember the order is bottom, middle, top, just as the names say. It is usually best to mix the oils in a clear glass so you can see what you are doing.

It has been said that a perfume is like gathering an armful of luscious rose pedals at the height of their bloom. The lovely scent, the heavenly fragrance and sensation you feel when surrounded by a quality perfume, fragrance or scent cannot be overstated. There can be a wide variety of ingredients in putting together a fragrance that is both appealing and attracting. Historically these ingredients have been divided between natural and synthetic; that is, between a man made or natural botanical substance. Perfume is meant to reflect and enhance the natural environment around us, which is why many people enjoy the thought of using only "Natural" fragrances and scents.

The best Perfume and fragrances will make your enticing.

In ancient civilizations materials and ingredients were added to oils used to perfume the skin. Today science is able to isolate and remove a pure single aroma from natural materials. As a general rule, the purer and more distilled the material, the more it costs. However, there are many wonderful fragrances you can buy that are both inexpensive and of a high quality.
