Methods for Reducing & Controlling Crime

By Robert Simington

This well written and very informative program details new innovative ideas for all areas which can be adapted to every jurisdiction in the world to improve crime fighting. The very simple approach provided in this document will allow all justice system authorities a new avenue to explore and initiate wherever possible. Positive change is desperately required to address and curb a great many problems related to the crimes of today.

With this program it is possible to – Reduce crime as well as reduce the overall cost of crime. The criminal can be held responsible for repaying all his/her associated crime costs. After a criminal has served their sentence, this person can then be reintroduced into society, with little or no likelihood of them ever returning to prison again. It is felt that most inmates will want to support the new programs.

All people in the world are affected by crime to some degree. Many persons have had one or more crimes perpetrated directly against them.

Every person who pays taxes must pay a portion of criminal crime costs. Wouldn't every taxpayer welcome a chance to pay fewer taxes? A very unique method is available to put the onus on the criminal for paying all their associated crime costs.

Police Forces are hampered beyond reason. Most Police Forces are short of manpower, and beyond this, in so many cases the Police initially apprehend the perpetrator, only to have him/her released immediately. Many times this nearly doubles the work for the Police.

The amount of crimes being committed in today's world is astronomical and forever increasing. Types and severity of crimes are escalating daily. Should criminal and justice systems around the world be patterned around this program, the positive improvements over time likely can not be envisioned at this time.

This writing will provide the reader with much interesting, thought provoking data. It is surprising that a program such as this was not found long before now.

I'm married, with three adult children, and a grandfather of two boys.

I enlisted in the Air Force at 18 and spent a number of years serving my country.

Next I went into business for myself and am presently president and owner of my own custom cabinet business, with my only son.

After many, many years of great frustration with the "PENAL AND JUSTICE SYSTEM", I wrote a book covering this.

Writing required much research and planning and I am very satisfied with the final result of my efforts.

Crime Writing beckons

By Nithya K

If your cash is running out fast and you have an incessant need to write, why not turn to crime?

No! Not committing crime, but to writing about crime. Crime is all around us, and people want to know about it. Don't believe me? Turn on the five o'clock news, Lifetime TV or USA TV Network. You'll see true crime stories run rampant across television schedules. True crime on television is the number two genre (next to romance). And guess what? Someone has to write those movie scripts—might as well be you.

Many movies are adapted from books. Again, someone has to write those books. It's legal, profitable, and downright intriguing.

You ever wonder, when you're watching the news, "How could she be so stupid?" or "Didn't they know they were living with a maniac?" I do, it's only natural. In fact, I think we feel it could never happen to us.

But, crime can happen to any one of us. That's where true crime writing comes in. It answers the questions in story form.

Methods for Reducing Controlling Crime

For instance, we have learned that kids believe 'strangers' are ugly and 'scary-looking'—like monsters. But we know that's not accurate, so we teach our kids that a stranger can be good looking, well educated, and considerate. We can tell them about Ted Bundy (without the violence) and show them a picture if we really want to make the point. Many surviving crime victims often say that the person was so nice; they never suspected he could be capable of such destruction. We know this because we were told a story either in verbal, written, or picture form.

If true crime writing interests you, begin by searching local newspapers for stories. Don't search across the country, unless you are independently wealthy! Anytime you see an article that looks interesting, clip it and put it in your 'true crime clippings' file. If there are more articles about the same crime, then you know it is intriguing enough to warrant your attention. Still... it does not mean it is enough for an entire book. To discover the answer to that question will take research.

Do you have a fascinating criminal? Is the crime random, or was the victim chosen for a reason? Is the place of action special (was it at Disneyland, for instance)? Can you write about a totally different lifestyle than what we know? Is the criminal a member of MENSAs? Is she dressed up as a clown when she commits her crimes? Is the victim the first woman space rocket engineer? Perhaps the victim is a deaf child. All of these facts increase the story's public interest and can take us into a world we have never been in before.

Are there subplots in the crime (not only did he murder his best friend, he also barged into his friend's family life and became like another son, then he robbed them one night, and then...). These questions will help you decide if you have a story worth considering?

True crime writing is lucrative and actually a challenging kind of fun. It is about combining journalism with novel writing. Nonfiction with fiction. If you have what it takes — determination, time, and a strong stomach — you can take up this as a career and soar.
