~~My First Experience in A Faraway Land~~
by: Jane Fulton

When I first came on the net, I was so bewildered! It was as if I had traveled to a faraway land and everyone spoke a foreign language. I couldn't understand them and they couldn't understand me. When I asked for directions, it didn't help. I didn't understand enough of the language to communicate properly, or to understand the directions. I felt so foolish!

Well, you either have to learn enough of the language to manage or go home. Now that you are faced with that decision, you either take the easy way out and go home, or find the resources to help you survive. I became so frustrated, that I almost took the easy way out and went home more than once. Then I was blessed to read the right ad and find the help and support I needed. My greatest supporter was Brenda Ruple <http://www.aunt-b.bigstep.com> When I needed to cry, she was there, when I needed to yell, she was there.....I don't know what I would have done without her support!

I decided that I wanted a website done my way. Everyone was telling me how easy it was! I didn't need to know HTML. I didn't realize how difficult it would be until I got started. I had picked up some of the 'lingo', so I felt that I could handle this! WRONG! There were days I emailed question after question to my host. I was sure that he was getting sick of me asking so many questions. There were days I cried and said "Why can't I get this?" There were even days I did nothing. I took a break!

I would ask questions and the answer I got was no clearer than the wizards (you know those little box things that's suppose to guide you through what you're doing step by step?). I soon found out that the wizards speak that foreign language too! I had to read and search out every tutorial I could find. Sometimes they didn't help. I would go to a quiet place and think it through. Sometimes my conclusions were right, sometimes they weren't, but I was determined not to give up!

Everyone needs help! I would like to give back the help that was given to me and I would like to thank the people who were there for me:

get involved in first (like getting our feet wet).

It takes years for most to be fluent in a new language. The internet is no different!

When I ask you to send me your questions. I mean it! If I don't have the answer, I will tap on my resources, or find out for you, or give you the information to do the research yourself. I'm by no means a 'seasoned internet guru', but am willing to share what I know. When we find the answer together, we both learn.

Any subjects you would like addressed in this newsletter, let me know. Let's learn together and make this the best newsletter it can be!

What To Look For In A Land Agent

By Strategic Land Investments

If you're considering buying land, you need to talk to a land agent.

As land investment grows in popularity, there is no shortage of land agents willing to help you channel your money into the land they promote. Finding a good, reliable land agent is the first step to profitable land ownership.

Whilst buying land is usually more straightforward than buying property, it is still a legally-binding deal and things can go wrong. That's why you need an honest land agent that can help you through the process from start to finish and ensure that everything runs smoothly. When you are looking on the internet for land agents, or speaking to an agent on the phone, make sure you check that they:

Recommend a solicitor

Even though the process is fairly clear-cut, it is a good idea to have a solicitor look over your contract to check that everything is in order. Agents that dissuade you from going to a solicitor may have something to hide - those that recommend that you take the contract away and make sure you're happy with it are a better option.

Talk you through the planning process

The level of profit you reap from your investment in land is largely down to whether planning permission is granted for the development of your land. Make sure that you ask the land agent about this process, so that you understand how it works, the timescales involved and what happens to the value of your land if planning is denied.

Give no guarantees

Even with an excellent investment like land, there's no guarantee that you will make a profit and a land agent shouldn't offer such a guarantee unless they can prove to you how your money will grow. Be very wary of agents who don't make it clear that profits are based purely on the rising value of the land, which is affected by a variety of factors outside the control of the agent.

Are happy to give recommendations

Ask if you can talk to some current or previous clients so that you can get some feedback on the advice and service given by the land agents. In today's world, most people will find land agents by looking on the internet and it makes sense to have access to other people who have used the agent rather than being seduced by a website - always make sure there is experience and expertise at the heart of the agency.
