Organize The First Party Game

By Jonathon Hardcastle

Instead of having to spend yet another weekend doing the same old routine of grocery shopping, washing your laundry, and cleaning the house, perhaps it is time to organize a party that will have a theme you are so familiar with since your childhood years. In fact, introducing the theme of a game party can make your friends wonder what you found while cleaning your closet and which game did the box you decided to open contained. Well, the answer is simple; memories. A box full of memories that you want to offer back to the people that are now in your life.

If you agree that this romantic idea might be of your friends' liking, then create some online e-mail cards, send them over to their e-mail inboxes during the middle of the week, select a party theme, any game's title could do, like "Monopoly" and then ask each one of them to bring something no one else would ever consider they would bring. When everyone arrives, put the party games you would like to play with your friends at the center of the room and ask them all to vote. You can even vote on how many times you would like to play each game that night. Since after the voting you will know which of the games are going to be played, you can put the rest of the boxes back into place and join the group.

Party games are games which share several features suitable to entertaining a social gathering of moderate size. Moreover, offering foods and beverages, putting on some nice music, remaining calm when encountering very competitive characters and do not get frustrated are the main advice for these people that will have to respond to their neighbors that a party was held.

The Game Party can host participants of a fairly large number and traditional multiplayer board games can accommodate four to six players at most, where party games have no fixed upper limit. But surpassing the number of fifteen can result in a very difficult situation where no one will enjoy the game and all will soon get bored waiting for their turn. Thus, fun and quick games, like guessing games, that let a whole group respond to a single question before moving to the next, are much better choices than the fixed area of a board game. Also, many party games simply divide everyone into two roughly equal teams. Pictionary and Taboo are thus two perfect games for the group that will be coming to the party game.

Ten Easy Steps to Great Kids Party Games

By Patricia B. Jensen

One of the most important elements of any kids birthday party is the time spent playing party games. If well planned, they can make great memories for the birthday child and guests alike; if not, they can be a minefield of problems. Don't despair! A little forethought and common sense are all that's needed to make your game time a smashing success!

Follow these ten easy steps to great kids party games:

1. Group together at least six to eight appropriate party games then adjust down according to your party timetable. Remember it's better to have more activities planned than not enough.
2. Run through each game to iron out any glitches that might arise. The party child will be only too happy to help with this and get a sneak preview of the party agenda in the process!
3. Enlist other adults as helpers so things will run smoothly and stress-free. You can promise to reciprocate when their child's birthday rolls around!
4. Ages and abilities of your party guests should be considered when choosing your party activities. A five year old won't be capable of playing charades, but he can probably pop a balloon with his bottom to get the prize inside!
5. Timing is everything! Start your party with an icebreaker game while guests are arriving and end with a quiet game to help kids wind down from all the party excitement.
6. Gather materials you'll need for each party game in advance and place them in the pre-selected kid-safe location. Pin the Tail on the Donkey just isn't the same when you've forgotten the blindfold!
7. Arbitrate – adult leaders should understand the rules of the games and gently enforce them. Kids have a strong sense of what's fair and will look to the adults to keep everyone playing by the rules.

8. Make sure each child gets a prize for his or her efforts so everyone feels like a winner. Wrapped candy, stickers, erasers, pencils, coins, medals and other small tokens make great prize incentives.

9. Encouragement and enthusiasm keep guests motivated and happy. For a fun twist, change the rules of the game and give a prize not only to the first player, but to the last one, saying it was the secret plan of the game.

10. Success! Congratulate yourself on a job well done! When your pooped party guests go home to Mom and Dad, this is the part they'll talk about the most!

By taking the first letter of each of the ten steps above, you can spell out what you will accomplish when you follow this guideline: GREAT GAMES!
