Red Hot Chili Peppers Tickets Remain A Hot Item After All These Years

By Jay Nault

Red Hot Chili Peppers tickets are still one of the biggest draws on the music market, and the band has been packing venues around the world for more than 20 years. Given the "shelf life" of a typical punk/hard rock band, this longevity is amazing, and the band's ability to adjust to the times and still maintain their original artistic integrity is one of the big reasons that the Red Hot Chili Peppers remains one of the biggest bands in the world.

Beginnings and Struggles

The band had no intention of becoming such a famous act when they got together to perform for the first time. In 1983, Fairfax High School alumni Michael "Flea" Balzary, Jack Irons, Anthony Kiedis, and Hillel Slovak got together for a one-time performance for the school's benefit. However, there was an obvious chemistry between the men, and they ultimately decided to start working together.

The band recorded an album, Red Hot Chili Peppers in 1984, and it did not do well. Their resulting tour also failed to generate much interest, so the band got back to work on another release. The group brought in the legendary George Clinton to produce their second album, Freaky Styley in 1985, and although the cut did not reach a widespread mainstream audience, it did get play on college radio stations. The work also spurred the development of a loyal cult following that remains to this day.

Chart Success

The band's next effort, The Uplift Mofo Party Plan in 1987 did hit the charts, and the band was beginning to become a recognizable name. As a result, more people became interested in their tours, and the band's on-stage persona started gaining attention on its own. This was the first time that Red Hot Chili Peppers tickets became a popular item, and the band was beginning to ascend the heights of the music industry.

However, this newfound success was also the first time the band had to face tragedy, as Slovak was found dead of a heroin overdose in 1988 after a long bout with addiction. This disease was an issue with the band for years, and Slovak's death was difficult for the remaining members to accept.

They did accept it, though, and continued to produce albums with increasing fanfare. Mother's Milk in 1989 turned out to be the smash hit that put the band on the map for good. Mainstream markets began to play their work with regularity and a newfound fan base was formed. The only controversy that resulted from this success came from the band's fans from the days prior to their success, as they began to claim that the band had "sold out", a claim vigorously refuted by band members to this day.

This release paved the way for the band to release five more albums, all of which climbed inside the top 5 on several music charts, and this transcendent stardom made the Red Hot Chili Peppers a household name for good.

Style

The band's style has also adapted with the times, mostly due to the artistic growth of the members.

They were once known as a pure hardcore punk rock band that was all about speed and tempo. As they grew more successful, different influences began to leak into their sound, and as of now the Red Hot Chili Peppers are known more as a pure rock and roll band.

Regardless of how you classify them, Red Hot Chili Peppers tickets are sought-after by millions of fans around the world every time they tour, and anyone who sees them is in for a night to remember.

History Of Salsa Sauce - The Mexican Connection

By Chris McCarthy

The history of Salsa sauce originated with the Inca people. Salsa (combination of chilies, tomatoes and other spices) can be traced to the Aztecs, Mayans and Incas. The Spaniards first encountered tomatoes after their conquest of Mexico in 1519–1521, which marked the beginning of the history of Salsa sauce. Aztec lords combined tomatoes with chili peppers, ground squash seeds and consumed them mainly as a condiment served on turkey, venison, lobster, and fish. This combination was subsequently called salsa by Alonso de Molina in 1571.

Charles E. Erath of New Orleans was the first person in salsa sauce history who began manufacturing Extract of Louisiana Pepper, Red Hot Creole Peppersauce in 1916. A year later, La Victoria Foods started Salsa Brava in Los Angeles.

In Louisiana in 1923, Baumer Foods began manufacturing Crystal Hot Sauce and in 1928 Bruce Foods started making Original Louisiana Hot Sauce – two salsa sauce brands that are still in existence.

In 1941, Henry Tanklage formed La Victoria Sales Company to market a new La Victoria salsa line. He introduced red and green taco, and enchilada sauces – the first of salsa hot sauces in US. He took over the entire La Victoria operation in 1946, which manufactures ten different hot sauces now covering the entire salsa spectrum, including Green Chili Salsa and Red Salsa Jalapeña.

According to the hot sauce history, salsa manufacturing in Texas began in 1947 with David and Margaret Pace and their picante sauce. In 1952, La Victoria Foods introduced the first commercial taco sauce in US and in 1955, La Preferida launched a line of salsas.

In 1975, Patti Swidler of Arizona launched Desert Rose Salsa. Four years later, in Austin (Texas), Dan Jardine began producing Jardine's commercial salsa, giving Austin the reputation in the history of Salsa Sauce as the hot sauce capital of America. Another Texas company, the El Paso Chili Company, was started in 1980 by Norma and W. Park Kerr. In 1986, Miguel's Stowe Away in Vermont launched a salsa line and in April, 1986, Sauces & Salsas Ltd. began manufacturing the Montezuma brand of hot pepper sauces and salsas in Ohio.

Between 1985 and 1990, Mexican sauce sales grew seventy–nine percent; between 1988 and 1992, the percentage of American households buying salsa increased from 16 to 36. By 1992, the top eight salsa manufacturers in the history of salsa sauce were Pace, Old El Paso, Frito–Lay, Chi–Chi's, La Victoria, Ortega, Herdez, and Newman's Own. By 1993, competition from smaller salsa companies was so fierce that Pace, Old El Paso, and six other brands saw Texas sales decline three percent.

The big news in 1994 was the buy out of two of the largest companies in the Fiery Foods Industry. Numero Uno salsa manufacturer, Pace Foods, was sold to Campbell Soup Company for an astronomical USD1.1 billion.
