Seinfeld: The Chairs by Alex Reidiboim and Martin Winer

Scene 1:

George and Jerry are at the diner having lunch. Jerry eats his sandwich while George stares blankly at the coffee in front of him.

George: I don't approve of coffee.

Jerry: How could you not approve of coffee?

George: Well it's not so much coffee it's that whole Juan Valdez thing. Talk about cruelty to animals.

Jerry: Cruelty to animals? They make coffee out of beans... beans don't have feelings.

George: It's not the beans it's the donkey.

Jerry: The donkey?

George: Yah, have you noticed on the coffee package that Juan Valdez's mule doesn't look very happy?

Jerry: I don't want to know how you can tell when a mule is happy... Hang on a second, you drink coffee all the time.

George: I am in to passive resistance. I enlighten others as to the ills of our society hoping that they will do something about it. This is my niche in life.

Seinfeld: The Chairs

Seinfeld
The Chairs

Prologue:

Jerry: Coffee is a miraculous drink. Just think of the miraculous chain of events that had to take place to create this beverage. Somewhere, somebody had to figure out to take Coffee beans, burn them in a fire for several hours, grind up the remains and then run boiling water through them. Just think of it. Thousands of years ago in the Colombian mountains there must have been a massive volcanic eruption which burned million of acres of coffee beans. Then the massive earthquakes and fallout crushed the beans. After the eruption, it began to rain and water passed over the ashes. So, here you have it, a Colombian peasant, his family killed, his village destroyed, clamors up to the steaming hot river and takes a swig. Sure every possession he ever had is destroyed, but boy, he sure feels perky!
