When you're out shopping for the best mp3 player, you want to get one has a big enough hard drive to hold all of your music collection or at least the amount that you want to carry around with you. Another feature you should consider when looking for the best media player is the aesthetical features that you need.

Do you like the look and feel of the player? Does it look like some that you would carry around and use quite frequently or, does it look too functional and techy?

These are the major factors that will determine whether or not you like your mp3 player and how often you will use it. You also want to check the sound quality. There is a slight variation in the sound that you receive from the different brands and also the type of headphones that you use.

Just like your regular stereo or portable CD player, if headphones are not of a high quality, you will get a squeaky sounding player that can easily ruin your favorite song.

The best mp3 players will include as much functionality as possible inside the case of the media player itself. If you need to do frequent memory upgrades as you add more tunes, then perhaps you should go ahead and buy one with a large hard drive even though you will have more space than you would need. You also want to consider the life of the battery.

Are you going to be using your media player in frequent short spurts like driving in the car or while you're outside jogging? Then the design of machine is a bit more important because you have a greater chance of dropping or scratching the mp3 player.

The best mp3 player is one that suits your lifestyle and gives you the storage space that you need.

If you plan to use it for six hours per day while doing chores and other tasks, then the battery life and sound quality is important. You don't want to stop playing the music every couple of hours and you don't to hear bad versions of really good songs in your ear.

Are ready to buy a portable mp3 player? by Syd Johnson

Recently, it seems like everyone looking to get a portable mp3 player. Like most new electronics, prices continue to drop and manufacturers continue to add more features. If you are like me and want to have music with you all the time, then a portable mp3 player would definitely be something to add to your wish list this year.

So what exactly does a portable mp3 player do?

It basically stores your music files in a compressed format on a mini hard drive. In fact, the hard drive space on some top of the line mp3 players like the Apple iPod can easily rival the space on a low end desktop PC. It is the genius of the design, and of the mp3 format that allows you to carry so many tunes on your player. Mp3 files are music files that have been compressed to about one tenth of their actual size.

To listen to the music, you need a player that takes the file and slowly decompresses it without losing any of the sound quality. This is what you get with an mp3 player. A portable mp3 player just takes it to the next level by adding an enormous amount of space. If you buy one of the 40Gig iPods for example, you can store about 10,000 songs on the system. Not bad for something that can easily fit inside a purse or jacket.

So how do you pick the best mp3 player?

You pick one based on your daily needs and your budget. Mp3 player are not cheap. Considering the amount of engineering it takes to get that music into such a small box, it's a wonder they don't cost more than they do. If you are a very active person who wants to take your player with you everywhere you go, experts recommend that you consider the flash memory models.

You won't be able to store as many songs as on the jukebox model, but it's a good way to get a stereo on the go. If the price is right and the sound is good, then a flash memory player is great for people who like to workout and stay active. It will stand up a little bit better to all the wear and tear on your system.

If you want to get the player, but don't plan on using it while working out, then there is the jukebox
