Triassic Triops Eggs In The Dust

By Daniel Garber

Triops eggs can be found in dried out water holes or ponds. In the Australian dessert, they get blown around by the wind. Those tiny eggs can survive month and even years in dry and harsh conditions. Take a magnifying glass and look at them. You will find different sizes, shapes, and color. The eggs are called cysts or resting eggs. After carrying them for almost 24 hours most Triops release the eggs into the water. Some Triops will cement them to plants or other structures in the water.

Now that we examined the eggs, we should prepare an environment for the Triops. Some of the instructions on triops packages say that a large jar will do. But remember that having Triops is not a one-time adventure. If you take care of them you will have offspring, and the lifecycle will keep going. If you want to enjoy you Triops more than a month I strongly urge you to invest some money in a small aquarium. A small 10-Gallon tank shouldn't cost that much. If you are skillful enough and have the resources (glass, silicon) you can just make a little tank yourself.

Since I use an aquarium I will refer to an aquarium, meaning any kind of large jar or other tank that you might use. It doesn't have to be fancy. Just clean your aquarium out, but do not use any soap. Then find a light place near a window. Triops should get at least 12 hours of light per day. You can also use an electric light source.

Triops love murky water. For my 10-gallon tank I used a bottom layer of half an inch of washed sand and a few crushed leaves. Ideal is reddish soil from the southwestern states of America. But other soil or sand will also do. Just spread the soil in the tank, then put the egg on it, and flood the tank with aged tap water (let water sit in a bucket for about 4 days).

The water temperature should be kept between 77 and 86 at all times ! Otherwise you Triops may die. Then you have to wait a couple of days until the eggs are completely rehydrated.

Dust Collection: Is It Your Concern?

By Sandy Baker

As a woodworker, you have a desire to create beautiful works of art. Probably one of the last things you want to think about is dust collection. But, this is a potentially important aspect for you to think about. Dust collection is a necessary part of a woodworker's life. Without it, you may be facing a lot of time dealing with a mess, an itchy rash or just the annoyance of it all. But, by taking advantage of the purchase of a dust collection network, you can minimize all of this.

Why Do You Need It?

Do you experience any of these things?

· Do your eyes, nose or throat become itchy, scratchy or irritated? · Some develop a rash from too much dust. · Do you have allergies or asthma that is aggravated by the dust in your shop? · In some very serious cases, dust can also lead to lung disease. · In even rarer cases, it has been shown to have lead to nasal cancer.

Perhaps you don't realize when you first begin your workshop, just how powerful dust from wood can be. You may want to purchase that new tool or that expensive workbench long before you consider a dust collection system. And, while this isn't something that you realize you want, it is something that you will need. Because dust collection is so very important in a wood workshop, you should have it at the very top of your to do list.

The good news is that there are some excellent products available to you to aid in your dust collection need. These products allow you to easily clean up dust, helping to remove it without causing it to fly into the air all over again. While dust collection is something you don't want to think about now, it is something that you won't want to regret later.
