The Nature of the Creator
Part 2 in the "Purpose of Creation" series
by

Why did the creator create the universe with all living beings? Why did he create these frail beings that appear as a weed one day and disappear the next? Was He/She looking for slaves to worship him or underlings to pay homage? Was he looking for adoration from his creation that had no freedom to do anything other than what he wanted them to do? The praises and adoration by his own creation would be just like my making a tape recording of self adulation and listening to it every day. It would not satisfy even the ego of a vainglorious human being. Then in what way will it benefit the great Creator of the universe?

If he is a cruel monster who likes to see living creatures go through agony, like an ignorant child plucking the wings and legs off flies, we can believe that he might have created human beings to cast them in hell and see them writhe in pain and beg for mercy.

But the creation does not reflect such cruel nature. On the contrary Creator has given mothers, even mothers of animals, infinite love for their progeny. They sacrifice their lives and offer themselves as prey when predators attack their young ones. We see this in Africa when leopards attack young gazelles. I have seen it myself. I could not find any cruelty in the nature of the creator.

If we watch birds, we will see their untiring enterprise to find food for their nestlings, coaxing the raptorial birds away from the nestlings, and protecting the young ones with self-sacrifice. All these are examples of their loving nature. These indicate that the creator has endowed them with love.

Still I did not find the purpose of creation. Then I argued that if I can find out the substance of the Creator, I might be able to find his nature, just as Mendeleev, the Russian scientist found the nature of atoms from their substance. I tried this approach namely to find the substance of the Creator but I could not. I thought that the substance of the creator may be energy. But there was no proof for it. It was only an assumption on my part. So I rejected that idea.

Then I changed the focus of my investigation. The next question I posed was with what substance did the Creator create the universe? I could not find a satisfactory answer even for that question.

Therefore the next question was "What was there for the Creator to create with?" I realised that before anything was created, only the Creator existed and nothing else. This is axiomatic and needs no proof. The Creator had only His/Her own substance. There was nothing else in the universe. Therefore he had to create with His own substance.

That means the substance of the creation and the substance of the Creator is the same. If the substance is the same, the nature must be the same. Then the nature of the tangible, observable and knowable creation, is the nature of the intangible, invisible, unknowable Creator. By studying the nature of the creation, I will know the nature of the Creator. This was an exhilarating idea and I was overjoyed. But very soon it ended in disappointment.

For there are millions of substances in the universe, organic, inorganic, chemical or physical, natural or artificial, solid, liquid, and on and on and each substance has dozens of natures or qualities. Which nature of which substance am I to study? I found it impossible to study all natures of all objects in the universe in my life time. I was about to give up in disgust.

Then an intuitive information appeared. Since the substance is the same for all creation there must be a common nature among them. If so, what is that common nature? So, I looked for common natures and I found many common natures. There were many substances with common natures such as liquid, solid, smooth or rough, hard or soft, natures common to many substances but I could not find one nature common to all substances.

Finally, when I was about to give up in disgust, as if by providential nudging, I hit upon gravity. Gravity is attraction or love. That could be the nature of the creator!

What's Hot In Google Labs - Google Page Creator

By Aviva

The Google Page Creator is, as you've probably guessed, a web page creator that is still being tested. The Page Creator allows anyone with a Gmail account to set up their own website. Currently, one site is allowed per account with up to 100 pages on that site. Templates are used in order to generate the overall look and feel of the site and as with all good web page creators, it includes a page manager and WYSIWYG editor.

Perhaps one interesting point is that in the FAQ section of the Google Page Creator, it states that Google can crawl the page within hours of being created. On the other hand, it also states that no preferential treatment is ever given to sites created by the Google Page Creator. Those who have struggled to get the all-important first Google indexed link or, worse still, for the manual submission service to take effect will know that this is a contradiction. Getting crawled and potentially indexed by Google within hours is definitely preferential treatment.

Hosting is provided in the form of a subdomain. You will receive yoursubdomain.googlepages.com as your own website. Each page that is added will be a part of this one site until a time when Google graduate the Page Creator from Labs into full time service.

Page Creator is still in the very early stages of production and testing apparently, so as yet nobody really knows when it will be published. However because it is essentially in Beta testing then you can sign up using a Gmail account and leave feedback regarding any changes or alterations you would like to see.

site for more information or to sign up and try it out.
