What's the Point?

What's the Point? by Joyce C. Lock

Our Rebellious Teens)

Point – I did it better than my parents.

Point – You did it better than your parents.

Point – Teens do not care about points. It makes no difference if you are the perfect parent. Adults get no recognition for whatever part they did right. In fact, because the teen feels controlled, they do not see that anyone else did anything right.

They want to stop being treated like a child (even if they are acting like one). They want the freedom to make their own mistakes and they don't care that adults think they are mistakes. They want their choices to be respected, because it is their choice, as one would respect choices of other adults; without trying to fix them. After all, they are almost 18 and are sick of being treated like anything less.

Point – In as much as we would like to help our 'almost adults' make adulthood choices, amidst their period of regression (where they are behaving more like a 12 year old), the power to control their destiny is not ours. There comes a point wherein the only option left is to let go and let God finish raising them. And in making the transition from parent to friend, we discover our own need for growth; thereby realizing God is not finished raising us, either.

Point – Once we acknowledge that our need to control is a result of fear for our children's future, consider that fear does not come from God, remember that we were once 'almost adults', too, and realize that God used our immaturity to grow us into a better person ... perhaps, then, we can trust God to protect them from irreversible harm and know He will be there to pick up the pieces for our children, too.

Point Pleasant – New Hit Show Review by Ratliff, J.

Point Pleasant is the new hit show from Fox that features a thrilling and supernatural edge. Point Pleasant is about a girl (Christina) who finds herself almost drowned near the town of Point Pleasant. Christina is rescued by lifeguard and taken to the town doctor. She will be staying there for a while it seems. Christina is on a search to find her mother, whom she does not know much about. What Christina does not yet understand is that she is the devil's daughter. Her father is not the person she calls Dad.
