Which Baseball Tickets Will Be Hot Items In 2007?

By Jay Nault

As we start to look ahead to the rest of the 2006 season and decide which baseball tickets are going to be the ones to get for contending teams as they push towards the finish line, we'd also like to look beyond October. Certain teams are building a young nucleus of players that will put them on many fans' "watch list" in 2007. Although none of these teams have been mathematically eliminated yet this season, they are all realistically out of time to make up the ground necessary to contend this year. However, the teams below should create excitement among their fans come spring.

Toronto Blue Jays

The Blue Jays are looking like they're going to finish 2006 with a winning record, and that's quite an accomplishment considering they share a division with the Yankees and Red Sox. The Blue Jays' core may not be "young" in the pure athletic sense, but Troy Glaus, Reed Johnson, Vernon Wells and Roy Halladay are all around 30, which is generally a baseball player's prime. All are having huge years, and everyone but Johnson is under contract through at least 2007. If Johnson comes back and the rest of their young players continue to grow, the Blue Jays will be the real deal in 2007.

Cleveland Indians

The Indians also play in a brutal division, and they've been battling with the Tigers, White Sox and Twins all year. They're hovering just a bit below .500, but Travis Hafner, Victor Martinez and Grady Sizemore have been bringing it at the plate all season. All of them will be back next year as well, which means that the Indians need to add some quality pitching and fill out their roster with high-quality role players. The team is close to putting together a winning formula, and the trio listed here is guaranteed to provide another season of thrills for Indians fans in 2007.

Florida Marlins

Can you hear the locomotive coming from Miami? Baseball tickets will be a hot item in South Florida in 2007, as the Marlins are following their traditional pattern – win the World Series, then rebuild with young and talented players and contend again a few years later. Next year could be that year. Their nucleus consists of young players like Miguel Cabrera, Hanley Ramirez and pitcher Josh Johnson. None of them appear to be going anywhere this offseason, and if Dontrelle Willis returns, this will be a heck of a young team that could hit its collective prime next season. There are no perennial powerhouses in their division anymore, so the Marlins won't have to run the gauntlet to compete for the division title.

Milwaukee Brewers

The Brewers were simply terrible for years, but they've quietly been putting together a team that features several potential stars who have been growing in the minor leagues over the past couple of seasons. Offensive weapons such as Bill Hall, Prince Fielder and Rickie Weeks all got significant time with the big club this season, which is why there's cause for optimism for the team in 2007. If Ben Sheets can ever stay healthy and team with pitchers such as Derrick Turnbow and Tomo Ohka, the Brewers will have a team that will give the Reds and Cardinals fits next season.

Although this is an early guess, these teams seem to be putting it together for the long haul. Other clubs could surprise, which seems to happen every season, but fans of these teams should be ready to grab their baseball tickets as soon as they become available for the 2007 season.

MLB Tickets In The NL East – It's The Mets And Everyone Else

By Jay Nault

Although there was a swap of positions in the middle of the division standings over the past few weeks, MLB tickets are only relevant for the rest of the 2006 season in one or possibly two cities. The Mets are just a game or two away from clinching the division, and we'll examine their postseason prospects. The Phillies also remain somewhat alive, so we'll examine them and the outlook for 2007 for everyone else.

New York Mets

Currently: The Mets have basically won the division on the heels of a tremendous season by Carlos

Beltran and decent pitching. Not to take anything away from them, but this is a relatively weak division as well, and the Mets have feasted on their lack of competition. This is a veteran team that knows how to close out a race, and that's exactly what they're doing as of this writing.

Outlook: The Mets are getting Pedro Martinez back just in time, and he along with Tom Glavine need to be strong in the postseason. Beltran also needs to maintain his high level of play, or else the Mets will struggle. As it is, they're as good a bet as anyone to get to the World Series.

Philadelphia Phillies

Currently: It's been a strange season for the Phillies, as they appeared to give up on the season only to surge into contention for the Wild Card spot. They're still barely hanging on in the chase, but they need to turn it on now, as they're running out of games to catch the Padres. The story of the season has been the emergence of Ryan Howard, and baseball fans everywhere want to root for a "clean" player as he puts up historic HR numbers.

Outlook: The Phillies could possibly land in the postseason, but regardless, they need pitching and another bat in their lineup to take the next step.

Florida Marlins

Currently: The Marlins took over third place in the division and moved over the .500 mark as of this writing with a 19–9 month. This is a team that's slowly but surely getting better with another young nucleus that could challenge for big things in the coming season as these players mature. The Marlins have talent behind the plate and on the mound.

Outlook: MLB tickets should be a hot item in South Florida in 2007, as the team looks to only get better as their young team puts another year of valuable experience behind them.

Atlanta Braves

Currently: The Braves' incredible postseason streak is ending this year, but what they've accomplished in recent times should not be overlooked. The 2006 season was ruined by injury and age, and the Braves have struggled to maintain any type of consistency.

Outlook: The Braves always seem to be stocked with young talent, and they'll need that next generation to come of age to contend in 2007, as Andruw and Chipper Jones aren't getting any younger.

Washington Nationals

Currently: The Nationals have been a bit of a disappointment this year after reaching the .500 mark in 2005. Their downfall was due to two things: bad pitching and no one besides Alfonso Soriano in the lineup that was a threat to produce runs.

Which Baseball Tickets Will Be Hot Items In 2007?

Outlook: The Nationals need another bat in the lineup and more pitching. If they get that done during the offseason, MLB tickets will again be a hot item in Washington, D.C.
