Who Said You Can't Make A Profitable Income Selling Your Short Stories? by Georgina Stath

The truth is, selling your short stories to publishers is not the way to make a comfortable living from something you enjoy doing. The reason isn't hard to understand. Publishers pay a once-off payment for your stories, if they are accepted. And that once-off payment, in most cases, isn't anything to get excited about.

But most writers settle for this because they tell themselves, well, at least my story is published.

Wrong.

You can have your cake and eat it too. You can become published and you can make a comfortable income too.

Other writers have done it. I have done it. And you can do it too.

What has brought this change of events? You might have guessed the Internet. The Web far surpasses all those other options open to us. With the Internet...

* It's in your capacity to start your own business, it doesn't matter what your circumstance are.

* You can keep building on that business to increase your income

* You can run your business on autopilot. Have you heard the stories where Internet business owners make money while they sleep? They aren't kidding.

* You can keep generating sales from your short stories. Don't only sell them once to a publisher. Keep selling the same stories over and over again.

Becoming frustrated with submitting to publishers I thought I'd try to sell my stories myself and `see what happens.' I saw what happened alright. I saw I'd been wasting my time all those years settling for less. I'm thankful to that writer who opened my eyes to the power of the internet.

I've made more from this book of short stories than I sell at <http://www.storieswithatwist.com> than I've seen all those years waiting for publishers to sell my stories.

I've learnt something from this experiment.

If you want things to happen - you have to make them happen.

The transition between unpublished and published lies in your thinking.

Do you want to keep submitting to publishers to see what happens?

Or

Do you want to sell your stories yourself and see what happens?

By Brice Mattson

Residual income is income that is generated again and again from one initial endeavor or investment. You can get five streams of residual income with your website by implementing the following methods.

Selling advertising space on your website is a great way to create a stream of residual income. This is an easy way to collect residual income because you set up advertising one time on your website and collect monthly revenue from advertisers.

Another stream of residual income can be obtained through website affiliates. Affiliate programs offering commission for products sold through your website can be quite profitable. The work is minimal, and multiple sales originating from links on your website can generate a flowing stream of residual income.

Residual income can be gained if you have a great amount of knowledge to share. Your website can be a source of that knowledge, and website members can pay to join your membership program. Residual income is gained over and over when new members join and old members renew their subscription.

Referrals are another stream of residual income that can be generated from your website. Locate and procure business links related to the subject of your website, and arrange to earn commission for helping businesses gain new customers. When websites referred by your website gain new business, you gain a profit.

Pay-per-click links can also bring in a good stream of residual income. Look for pay-per-click links related to the subject of your website. Those interested in your website will likely be interested in your pay-per-click website links.

These five streams of residual income when added to your website can bring in unlimited income with little effort. Get five streams of residual income, and make your website work for you.
